Lesson Introduction

Your personality dictates how you perceive the world, how you interact with others, and the people you attract. Your personality also influences the way you manage other people. We need managers and leaders to understand the people with whom they work. This means understanding personalities, understanding how to manage different people, and understanding your own shortcomings

According to (Cherry K., 2019), here are some key things to know about the Meyer-Briggs personality type indicator.

Four different scales used for the entire test. The different personalities are made up of these 4 types.

Extraversion (E) vs. Introversion (I)

These are two types of ways in which people express themselves and in which they perceive the world. People who are extroverts speak more, interact with more types of people, are more likely to network and like to be around others. Introverts are people who like to be alone, they recharge on their own and they have a small group of friends. You also get people who are in between the two types. The indicator tests which one people relate to more.

Sensing (S) vs. Intuition (N)

This is also two categories that people fall into. They have noted the following about the two types: "People who prefer sensing tend to pay a great deal of attention to reality, particularly to what they can learn from their own senses. They tend to focus on facts and details and enjoy getting hands-on experience. Those who prefer intuition pay more attention to things like patterns and impressions. They enjoy thinking about possibilities, imagining the future, and abstract theories".

Thinking (T) vs. Feeling (F)

Thinkers tend to use more logical data and information to make decisions. Feelers use more of their emotions to guide them when making decisions.

Judging (J) vs. Perceiving (P)

Judgers prefer to see structure and make firm decisions in their life. Perceivers tend to be people who are more open and flexible when it comes to their life approaches and decisions.

Which personality type makes better leaders

“Much of our public life is dominated by extroverts. In fact, we’re living in an ‘extrovert ideal’, in a University of North Carolina study, it was found that 96% of managers and executives display extroverted characteristics”. (Mizne, 2018)

It does not mean that introverts don’t have a shot. A new study found that regardless of your personality type, the following traits are the most important when it comes to leadership. Those traits are agreeableness, conscientiousness, emotional stability, and openness to experience.

Facts to know about introverts

They seek meaning

Introverts need to know that what they’re doing is making a difference. You also have to explain to them why they are doing something in order to motivate them.

One-third of people are introverted

A lot of people can act like extroverts but in actual fact are introverts. This means that a lot of people put on a brave face for work as they do not feel comfortable being themselves.

Introverts are active listeners

They take in what you’re saying and they recall the details and facts. They are great in understanding people and what is happening around them.

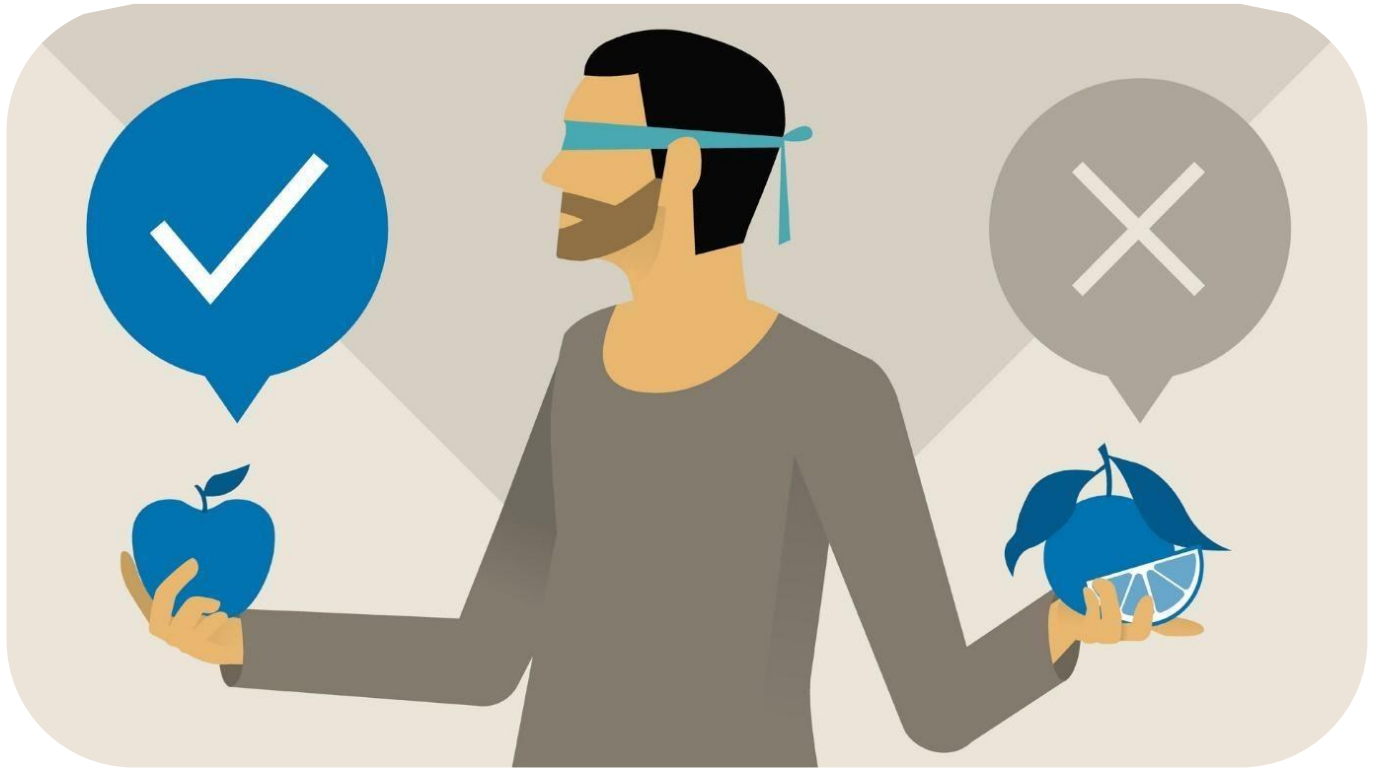

Introverts are proactive

They are great at their jobs. They are able to problem-solve, be proactive, be creative and take in what needs to be done.

Introverts tend to be more creative

They take time away from others and explore the problems. They have time to think creatively as they can internalize a problem and solve it on their own.

Steps to reduce bias in the workplace

According to (Sabel, 2018), you can take several steps to limit the bias in your workplace.

“You can think of unconscious bias as the cognitive equivalent of muscle memory, coming into play when we are faced with gaps in our own personal experience. Due to the human brain’s tendency to create shortcuts, everyone has unconscious biases”.

Step 1: Set expectation and collect feedback

You can start by sending out a survey. Make sure to add why you’re doing this, when it needs to be completed, and that you need everyone to be honest. Ideally, make sure that the feedback is honest and open.

Questions to ask:

- Are you currently comfortable in the workplace?
- Do you think your performance is effectively and fairly assessed?
- When you think of bias, what do you think of?

Make sure to give a good mix of questions to get the most information that you can.

Step 2: Encourage participation

Ask for employees to get involved in the training session, help everyone add to the process. This will help people share their stories, experience and how to overcome the issues.

Step 3: Build bias awareness

Make sure to share the results so that employees know what is happening in the company. Education is key to understanding the bias in the company and in your country.

Step 4: Reduce opportunities for bias through structure

Update your systems to limit the amount of bias in the workplace. Rethink your self-evaluation, your mentorship program, and how you promote within your company.

"The eye sees only what the mind is prepared to comprehend".
